The Berkman Center for Internet & Society at Harvard University has opened its annual call for fellowship applications. This opportunity is for those who wish to spend the 2015-2016 academic year in residence in Cambridge, MA as part of Berkman's community of pioneers, and who seek to deeply engage in the collaborative, cross-disciplinary, and cross-sectoral exploration of some of the Internet's most interesting, challenging, and compelling issues.

Applications will be accepted through Friday December 12, 2014 at 11:59 p.m. Eastern Time, and applications will be submitted online through our Application Tracker tool at: http://brk.mn/1516app

We invite applications from folks around the globe working on a broad range of opportunities and challenges related to Internet and society, which may overlap with ongoing work at Berkman or will expose us to new opportunities and approaches. We encourage applications from a diverse group of scholars, practitioners, innovators, engineers, artists, and others committed to understanding and advancing the public interest who come from -- and have interest in -- countries industrialized or developing, with ideas, projects, or activities in all phases on a spectrum from incubation to reflection.

More information about this call for applications may be found below and at http://brk.mn/fellows1516.

More information about the Berkman Center Fellowship Program may be found at http://brk.mn/fellows.

A Fellowship Program FAQ may be found at http://brk.mn/fellowsfaq.