

Julie Wronski

Chair Elect

Julie is an Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Mississippi (USA), where research lies at the intersection of American Politics and Political Psychology. Using survey, experimental, and quantitative research methods, she explores the ways in which group identities and personal dispositions shape political behavior, public opinion, and vote choice. Her research has been published in leading journals, and featured in media outlets including The New York Times, Washington Post, and Vox.com.

Currently, her research focuses on the roles of national and partisan identities, authoritarianism, and empathy in shaping political behavior in the United States. These lines of scholarship are all distinctly multi-disciplinary in nature, and integrate theories and methodologies from both political science and psychology. She teaches in the areas of American Government and Research Methodology – including the first two semesters of the University of Mississippi Political Science PhD program's methods sequence. You can follow her on Twitter @julie_wronski.

Short bio for Twitter: @julie_wronski, Assistant Professor at @OleMissRebels whose research focuses on how national and partisan identities, authoritarianism, and empathy shape political behavior in the United States.